Like you, I was also concerned that I will not be able to write my own father of the groom speech. I was so distressed that I wasn't able to sleep weeks before the marriage. That was until I calmed down and searched the web for information concerning how to write wedding speeches.

I found plenty of tips, so please let me share with you some of the useful tips that helped me write my dad of the groom speech.

1. Write an introduction about yourself. The audience may or may not know you, but irrespective of this fact, you still need to make an introduction about who you are and what your role is in the wedding.
2. The middle of your speech should consist of uplifting stories or stories about the bride and groom. Follow the creative writing rule of show, don't tell. Use metaphors, colorful words, and strong images when writing your speech.

You can tell the crowd how the couple met or how they modified each other for the better when they met, and so on. You can give them friendly recommendations also. Just don't overdo it as you do not need to turn your marriage speech into a sermon.

When writing the middle of your speech, you can tell plenty of stories or anecdotes. You need to do this, however, under one unifying theme. Having a single theme will help you make your speech short, easy, and cohesive. Abruptness is the key to your marriage speech.

3. The last thing you want to pen and end your speech is the compulsory congratulations and best wishes offered to the bride and groom. You can also end with a funny anecdote or a recommendation; just keep it short and easy like the rest of your speech.
4. Practice your speech with someone else. You can drag one or two people to hear your speech. This is vital to help you correct mistakes and to see the reactions of a genuine audience in real time.
